Family Money: A Home as Inflation Guard

By RICHARD PHALON

THE NEW YORK TIMES, THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1978

There is fresh evidence that buying a home is one of the smartest investments around. Over the long haul, owning a piece of residential real estate has proved to be a better hedge against inflation than United States Government bonds, Treasury bills, or common stocks.

Common stocks, in fact, according to a study done by Eugene F. Fama and G. William Schwert, have been hammered down in price to the point where they have provided no protection at all against the rising cost of living.

"Only private residential real estate," the two men conclude in the current issue of the Journal of Financial Economics, "is a complete hedge against both expected and unexpected inflation."

Mr. Fama is the Theodore O. Yntema Professor of Finance at the University of Chicago's Graduate School of Business. Mr. Schwert is an assistant professor of finance at the University of Rochester's Graduate School of Management.

The academics' conclusion, based on regression analysis and other tools of the statistical trade, is a factor that has to be taken into consideration by anyone who is interested in seeing how your money is going to be worth in the future.

As often as not, of course, the answer is framed in terms of personal preference rather than hard numbers. Some people are apartment dwellers because they just don't like to fuss with the leaks, the repairs or the high taxes that are the lot of most homeowners.

At some point in the decision, though, investment values have to come into play. Manly because of the rate at which land and construction costs have risen, the price of a new home has all but absorbed the cost of the old. But even the price of an old home is rising, and the price of some of the older homes has climbed pretty much in tandem with that gain.

The likelihood is for a continuation of that long-term trend, though not necessarily at the same rate. A confirmed apartment dweller might prefer to put his or her cash to work in some form of investment—government bonds, Treasury bills or even a savings account.

The cash working for the apartment dweller would be the equivalent of a down payment, plus such closing costs as prepayment taxes, insurance premiums and loan discounts. On a $50,000 home, all of those costs would total at least $6,000.

At 6 percent interest, the money would double in a dozen years. The apartment dweller would be far ahead as the homeowner, but the Fama-Schwert study suggests that the spread would not be insupportably wide if the cash had been put in government bonds.

Mr. Fama and Mr. Schwert, moreover, found that the fall in interest rates tends to be offset by rising real estate taxes.

For short periods, though—up to three years or so—the costs of buying a home (including buying a house and closing costs, commissions and the like) can chew up even runaway resale values. Thus, executives who move around a lot may be better off renting than buying.

One of the big pluses of owning is the forced saving of monthly mortgage payments. Those savings are comparatively small in the early years, but build rapidly in the later years. It takes a decade, for example, to pare a 30-year loan of $22,200 at 7.5 percent down to $19,400. But the balance drops to $13,150 after 20 years and all of that would be retired in the last 10 years of the mortgage.

The equity build-up, plus the lift of rising prices, is the big reason why the old homestead proved to be a better buy than the stock market, but there are still exceptions in which renting is the choice that is the better bet.

It's better to rent when:

1. You sell out and move to a community before buying.
2. You're not sure whether salary increases will come along quickly enough to enable you to afford as much house as you'd like to live in.
3. You're not sure where you want to live or how much house you need.

Calendar of Events: A Fair, Lectures, a Workshop

Park Avenue Antiques Fair, Seventh Regiment Armory, 67th Street and Park Avenue.

The Tennis Hall of Fame will be sharing space at the Park Avenue Antiques Fair with about 100 exhibitors starting this week and continuing through March 12 at the Seventh Regiment Armory.

A wide range of antiques will be displayed—glass, porcelain, furniture, silver, books, paintings, prints and prints—representing American, European and Eastern craftsmanship. For the tennis fan, the Hall of Fame exhibit will include tennis costumes from the 1870s to the present along with an original racquet press and other antique racquets. Guest lecturers will speak each day at 2:30 P.M. (860): the hour-long seminar will follow at 8:30 P.M. ($50).

For registration information, call 398-9474.

Fix-It Workshop, Abraham & Straus, 420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.

As part of Wolfe'S Women's Series held each Sunday, A & S will conduct a three-hour workshop this Sunday to teach women how to make simple electrical repairs and fix leaky faucets.

Dorothy Carbo, author of "The Fix-It Guide for Women," will instruct the group. The workshop runs from noon to 3 P.M. and costs $3, including lunch.
